HOW TO SUPPORT THE INDEPENDENCE OF CHILDREN

As children get older they start to perceive themselves more in terms of their personality or psychological traits rather than their physical characteristics. With trial and error, children realize that there are things they can do, things they can do with some help and some things they cannot do. Children must face this reality. It isn't very healthy if children think they can do everything and be good at everything and then one day are they faced with a problem and come to recognize that they have failed. This realism is vital in the healthy development of self concept and self esteem. It is also crucial for children to get to know themselves as well. They should be aware of their strengths, weaknesses and interests. As self esteem is developing through childhood, children are constantly comparing themselves to others while at the same time developing their own standards. With this, they should be content with themselves and set realistic goals for themselves.

understanding, Self reliance, Ask for help when necessary, Adaptive to social situations, Curiosity, Problem solving skills, Not blatantly dependant on others How do we as teachers then assist children in becoming independent? The answer is to get to know them and to be aware that each child is an individual. Each child has different likes and dislikes, have different interests, differ in their strengths and weaknesses and have different needs. Children should be given options and then given the right to choose. Through this they will feel more important and will gain confidence. And as teachers we must respect their choices, given that it is rational and doesn't pose any risks. We must support children in solving their own problems. Spoon feeding and providing everything to children does no good and is actually harmful in the long run. Everybody learns in a different way so as teachers we must use methods that guide individual learning. School shouldn't just be about a classroom with 4 walls, it should be a park, a museum and a farm. Our goal for children should be about producing and not consuming.

Here is a list of some character traits that help children succeed; Good emotional
